After his conspicuous absence from Monday's practice Womens Tajae Sharpe Jersey , wide receiver Corey Davis has returned to Titans training camp practice. Titans Senior Writer Jim Wyatt and ESPN Reporter Turrón Davenport tweeted that Davis, indeed, was back in action. Rumors of a possible injury created a stir of panic among Titans fans. However, Davis back on the the practice field indicates that whatever he was dealing with is not a major concern. Head coach Mike Vrabel attempted to ease anxiety yesterday when he stated Davis would be fine. A suited up Davis likely means fans can put trust in Vrabel assurances moving forward. How active will Davis be in practice? That is not known at this time. Davis is not as banged up as many assumed, there is a chance he could be active in the preseason opener against Green Bay. The workload Davis receives in practice today will be telling. If he resumes normal duties, then the odds of him suiting up against the Packers increase. If he sees a lighter workload Womens Ryan Succop Jersey , don't count on him catching passes from Marcus Mariota Thursday night. Nevertheless, the news can provide Titans fans with some relief. Early reports of Davis potentially having a hamstring injury led some to wonder if he'd be dealing with nagging injuries throughout the early part of his career. The second year receiver taken fifth overall in 2017 is eager to prove he was worth his draft selection. If health can become a non concern, he will have the opportunity to do so in OC Matt LaFleur's new offense. The receiving group that trots onto Lambeau Field Thursday may or may not have Davis. It is obvious the offense will flow much better with Davis on the field. For the latest on Davis and other updates from Titans training camp, click here. With left tackle Taylor Lewan, right tackle Jack Conklin, and backup right tackle Dennis Kelly all missing today's matchup against the Titans due to injury <http://www.titanscheapshops.com/cheap-authentic-taylor-lewan-jersey> , that all but sets up defensive end J.J. Watt—you may have heard of him—to have a big game. Watt has missed significant time in the prior two seasons, but is completely healthy and entering a great situation (for him) with the Titans missing three of their tackles.

That's going to create a lot of pressure for whoever is starting today. gamepass.nfl.com Against the Patriots last week, Watt spent the second half terrorizing Tom Brady with pressure. Part of what's made him such a special defender is how quick and violent his hands are around the edge. He uses his hands to counter backup right tackle (yeah, I couldn't sugarcoat this one) LaAdrian Waddle's and manages to get his hands on Brady, disrupting his pass. gamepass.nfl.com This time, Watt goes up against the starting right tackle Marcus Cannon Cheap Kevin Byard Jersey , but the result remains the same. Watt uses his violent inside hands to create leverage over Cannon, allowing him to burst through inside and force Brady to panic for an inaccurate throw. gamepass.nfl.com Having slowed this one down, Watt (against Waddle again) was a little ahead of the snap, though an offsides penalty was never called. Still, Watt's pressure around the edge allows third-year nose tackle D.J. Reader to get a sack on Brady. Honestly, you could say any outside pass rusher on the Texans would have a big day against the Titans' weakened tackle positions Cheap Marcus Mariota Jersey , but I think it's a healthy Watt who could benefit most. He should terrorize Tennessee all game long.
